vital industry and say, you know, you're excluded because you're bad actors. Well, as I was thinking about it, I thought back to when I was on the Natural Resources Committee. And we had a lot of debate and discussion about bad actors in livestock facility permitting. If somebody comes into the state and they've got a record of horrendous violations of the environment, do we want to give them a foothold here? Do we want to process their permit in a normal fashion? Or if someone is here and they have a series of problems, do we want to continue to let them operate as if business is going on as usual? Using that analogy and that background, and also dovetailing onto some of the things that are already in the act that pertains to the Employment Investment Growth Act, I've had the idea that somehow we ought to be able to put in statute provisions that say that if someone that has qualified for these credits violates our environmental laws, violates our health and safety laws, violates our labor laws, there ought to be some penalties other than just whatever penalties there are under OSHA or whatever might apply in that respect, and that those penalties ought to somehow dovetail into our incentive program. Now, having processed this idea, starting at about five o'clock last night, I'll be the first to admit that this amendment that this amendment is probably not in the form that it should pass if the idea is accepted by you. But very simply, the idea is that if someone receives incentives under this act, and they habitually or intentionally violate any environmental, health, safety, labor law of the state or the United States that results in significant or material damage to the environment or to any person, that a portion of the incentive shall be recaptured or disallowed as provided under this section. And I struggled with how that process would work. But in this act now, we have the Department of Revenue in a position to recapture these credits for other violations or other circumstances that might arise. If they don't continue to comply with the contract they sign, the Department of Revenue does have the power under this act now to partially disallow or recapture credits. So I continued with that same process, saying that the Department of Revenue could recapture partially the credits or disallow future credits for those violations. I am most interested in whether or not you're interested in this concept. And if you're interested in this concept, if you feel that this is a better approach than taking one industry and
